Why study Indian Constitution?

It seems today, once again, universities and colleges across the globe, including India, are positioned at a critical juncture, an impasse, a crisis, that goes well beyond the economic, technical, and administrative churning imposed by a pandemic. Far worse, what we face in India is a constitutional learning crisis, where the foundation of our own "constitutional values" and "constitutional morality" find little or no presence in institutional learning.

B.R. Ambedkar greatly emphasized the need for making people believe in values enshrined in the Preamble for the Constitution to remain a living, breathing document. There is tremendous value in making "constitutional morality" a yardstick for judging social, political developments, for a democracy like India to first survive, and then thrive. The role of universities and other educational institutions is vital in this regard.
